One of the most tangible benefits of majoring in economics is that not only do you get the business-skills background that an employer would look at, but you are also part of an integrated liberal arts education. That provides a more holistic look at concepts. It’s an entirely different way of approaching things.

Economics is a social science, and as such, it doesn’t just deal with specifics. It doesn’t provide answers—it asks bigger questions.

One of the most tangible benefits of majoring in economics is that not only do you get the business-skills background that an employer would look at, but you are also part of an integrated liberal arts education. That provides a more holistic look at concepts. It’s an entirely different way of approaching things.

Economics is a social science, and as such, it doesn’t just deal with specifics. It doesn’t provide answers—it asks bigger questions.