26% enrolled in graduate or professional school

Clinical psychology: Marquette University, Sam Houston State University
Dentistry: Columbia University, Harvard University
Health exercise and sports science: The Citadel
International relations: IE School of Global and Public Affairs in Spain
Law: UCLA, University of Michigan
Medicine: Boston University, Northwestern University, University of Illinois at Chicago, University of Iowa, University of Massachusetts, University of Pennsylvania
Neuroscience: University of Chicago
Occupational therapy: Boston University, Washington University in St. Louis
Psychology: Harvard University
Public health: University of Missouri
Sports management: Columbia University
Political science: Duke University

Choosing the Spanish major is an important decision for your education as a whole person and becoming a member of the global society. Having some sort of cultural and linguistic competency is crucial. The Spanish major does an amazing job in preparing us for that.

As you progress, you get to the point where you're exploring these different topics—anthropology or philosophy or theology—but you're exploring them all through the Spanish language. It's like getting two things done at once—you're not only delving into these very interesting intellectual topics, but you're also getting better at a language and understanding a culture more deeply.

I want to be a physician, and there's a huge demand for physicians who speak Spanish. It's been very important to learn the language in order to be able to provide medical services to people that often are unable to effectively translate their symptoms or the array of problems they're dealing with.